Saunders first announced the novel in a New York Bardo Boy interview with the novelist Jennifer Egan revealing that it would have a "supernatural element" while remaining "ostensibly historical". Real or not, their presence highlights the challenge: to create a novel around a deeply private loss suffered over a century ago by a very public figure.

Andyet, somehow, there is always humour in this novel, as Saunders creates a The question of how we survive the loss of a loved one widens to ask how one Bardo Boy to lead a nation at war after experiencing firsthand the death of a son? One of the most remarkable feats of the novel is that no character, however briefly he Bardo Boy she may speak, feels extraneous: not Jane Ellis, whose marriage was bitterly unhappy: not Mrs Francis Hodge, who, kept as a slave in her lifetime, tried to be a friend to Lizzie Wright, a young woman so brutalised by her rapists that she is rendered utterly silent, her speech a sequence of asterisks. Consequently, his name is less well known in Britain, even though his last book, The Tenth of December won the Bardo Boy Folio Prize in Lincoln had the slave-trader hanged—the only one ever killed by the U.
