While it is unlikely that "drop, cover Preparedness in the Atomic Age hold on" will protect against a building collapse, in earthquake-prone areas in the United States building codes require that buildings withstand quakes up to an expected magnitude enough to allow evacuation after shaking stops. Ducking and covering in either scenario would theoretically afford significant protection from falling or flying debris. There must be security for all, or no one is secure. The successful negotiation The tactic is also widely practiced in schools in states along the West Coast of the United Preparedness in the Atomic Age where earthquakes are commonplace. The nuclear fallout that returns to the earth following the blast is the most dangerous, and then over time fallout radiation becomes less dangerous due to the half-life of the radioactive particles.
